

III. 4. Conflicts of Interest (page 8-15):

Goal: The duty of loyalty to the client is paramount.

A. Organization of the State Public Defender System: The State Public Defender System is made up of eleven Regional Public Defender Offices, the Office of the Appellate Defender, the Major Crimes Unit, Conflict Coordinator, and various local offices and contract attorneys. The Office of the Appellate Defender is independent from all trial division offices. The Conflict Coordinator is independent from all trial division offices and is independent of the Appellate Defender Office.

Each local office is under the direct supervision of a Regional Deputy Public Defender. The Major Crimes Unit is under the direct supervision of a manager who is responsible for directing, coordinating, and evaluating the work of attorneys employed in the unit. The Major Crimes Unit manager is solely responsible for providing guidance to and determining litigation strategy for attorneys assigned to his supervision. The Regional Deputy Public Defenders are responsible for directing, coordinating, and evaluating the work of attorneys employed in the local office and any contract attorneys that are also assigned to his or her overall supervision. The Regional Deputy Public Defenders are solely responsible for providing guidance to and determining litigation strategy for attorneys assigned to their supervision.

Each regional office and the Major Crimes Unit has its own support staff and investigators separate from those employed by any other independent office. Each office is physically separate from the others. No supervisor or staff from one independent office has access to files or premises of another independent office. However, a supervisor or staff from a regional office has access to the files and premises of a local office that is under that regional office's supervision. Each office has its own phone numbers, facsimile equipment, and computers. Although computer networks will be linked for purposes of reporting statistical information, confidential client information shall be separated by appropriate firewalls or other screening devices.

Neither the Chief Public Defender nor anyone assigned to the State Public Defender System administrative division exercises general control or influence over the handling of individual trial division or appellate division cases, has access to client files or client confidences, has keys to any independent office, or has unsupervised access to the premises of any independent office. ~~The Chief Public Defender, the Training Officer, and the Contract Officer will take cases as assigned.~~ The only other exception to this rule is for major litigation cases in which the State Public Defender's office may provide assistance through its Major Crimes Unit. While the Office of the State Public Defender must sign off on all expenditures and coordinate in advance on some expenditures for expert witnesses, certain other investigative assistance, and equipment purchases, these requirements are only to ensure compliance with State disbursement procedures and promote sound fiscal practices; they do not dictate trial strategy, which remains the exclusive province of the Regional Public Defender's Office or Major Crimes Unit.

B. State Public Defender System Organization and Conflicts of Interest: Each independent regional office, including any local office under its supervision, is a separate “firm” for purposes of representing clients. The Major Crimes Unit is a separate “firm” for purposes of representing clients. Accordingly, a client with a conflict of interest with one regional office may be represented by another regional office or the Major Crimes Unit. In such an event, the client shall be screened through appropriate devices and procedures from having contact with any confidential information concerning any other case in the conflicting region. A local office may not represent a client in conflict with a client of its regional parent office, or vice versa.

The Office of the Appellate Defender is also a separate “firm” for purposes of client representation. The Office of the Appellate Defender may represent a client in conflict with a client of any regional or local office, or in conflict with any contract attorney. In representing the former client or a trial division office, the Office of the Appellate Defender may take the position that a regional or local office attorney, or a contract attorney, did not provide the client constitutionally effective assistance of counsel.

C. Examination for Potential Conflicts of Interest: Early detection of a potential conflict of interest is crucial to its appropriate resolution. As soon as is practicable following appointment to represent a client, a Regional Public Defender Office ~~or the Major Crimes Unit~~ must examine its records to determine whether it may have a conflict of interest involving another current or former client, or otherwise. An office must promptly update this examination as it investigates the case and receives discovery, with particular attention paid to finding out if conflicts may exist with anticipated witnesses for the prosecution or defense. In the event that a potential conflict of interest develops, the matter shall be referred to the Training-Conflict Coordinator, who shall be provided sufficient facts to decide the issue.

Clients and potential witnesses may also have information that will assist in uncovering possible conflicts of interest. Accordingly, each local public defender office should use standard questions for its client intake interviews and witness interviews that are designed to uncover conflicts on forms developed by the State Public Defender’s Office.

In a situation in which a public defender’s office makes an initial appearance on behalf of codefendants, the clients must be cautioned at the first opportunity not to disclose confidential information concerning the case until a determination can be made if a conflict exists.

D. Policy and Guidance on Potential Conflicts of Interest: It is the policy of the Office of the State Public Defender that all State Public Defender System offices will comply with all legal requirements and ethical guidelines relating to conflicts of interest in the representation of clients. The Rules of Professional Conduct are mandatory authority. To the extent that this Standard may be interpreted as inconsistent with the Rules, the latter controls.

The difficulty in developing case-specific policies is that it is impossible to formulate rules that will apply in every situation. The following guidance contains examples of situations where conflicts are likely to result and others that are probably not conflicts of interest. This is not an exclusive list; however, this list contains many situations expected to arise in cases. Any potential conflicts must be resolved on a case-by-case basis.

E. Codefendants: Public defender offices within a region or the Major Crimes Unit will not represent codefendants except in rare situations when it is clear that each codefendant's interests are completely consistent with the others and each codefendant agrees. Even so, the better course of action is to represent only one codefendant. If possible, the regional public defender should keep one of the cases. If the public defender can make a choice of codefendants before obtaining privileged information from either one, the choice should be the codefendant with the most serious or difficult case. Otherwise, the local public defender should keep the first codefendant to which the office is appointed and ~~make arrangements for other counsel for the other codefendant.~~ refer the other codefendant(s) to the Conflict Coordinator.

F. Simultaneous representation of a defendant and a potential prosecution witness or alleged victim: There will almost always be a conflict of interest in this situation. There may not be a conflict if the prosecution witness's credibility or the alleged victim's character is not at issue, and the prosecution witness' testimony is not a crucial factor in the defendant's case. This issue should always be referred to the Training-Conflict Coordinator.

G. A former client is a potential prosecution witness or alleged victim: This is not a per se conflict of interest, but a conflict will often exist in this situation. There may not be a conflict of interest if the prosecution witness's credibility or the alleged victim's character is not at issue, and the prosecution witness's testimony is not a crucial factor in the defendant's case. In other cases, there may not be a conflict of interest if the local public defender's office has no privileged information about the former client that would be useful in representing the defendant.

H. Investigation reveals that another person may have committed the charged crime and that other person is a former client: This will almost always be a conflict of interest. This presents a conflict of interest if the local public defender's office has privileged information about the former client that would further the theory that the former client is the perpetrator.

I. An employee of the local public defender's office is a potential prosecution witness or an alleged victim: Either situation is a conflict of interest.

J. The defendant was convicted in a previous case while represented by the local public defender's office and has a colorable claim of ineffective assistance of counsel in that case: This presents a conflict of interest as long as the ineffective assistance claim is unresolved.

K. Situations that do not present per se conflicts of interest: The following are not per se conflicts of interest. However, if the particular situation actually degrades the quality of client representation or creates an appearance from which a reasonable person would doubt that a local public defender's office can exercise independent professional judgment on behalf of a client, a conflict would exist. The individual circumstances control. They include:

- a. A dispute between client and attorney or other member of the local public defender's office staff.

- b. A client refuses to follow an attorney's advice, unless it involves the commission of a future crime.
- c. A client files a grievance against the attorney with the attorney's supervisor or the Office of Disciplinary Counsel. A client should not be allowed to manipulate appointment of counsel by filing a frivolous grievance against an assigned attorney. However, a non-frivolous grievance may create a conflict of interest. A client complaint, even if not creating a conflict of interest, should usually justify the local public defender in changing assigned counsel as a matter of supervisory discretion.
- d. An alleged victim or potential prosecution witness has a friend or relative in the local public defender office.
- e. A witness for the defense is a present or former client, unless there is a reasonable possibility the testimony could turn adverse to the defendant or the theory of defense may implicate the present or former client.
- f. An employee of the public defender office is closely related by blood or marriage, is engaged to be married, or otherwise has a close relationship with an employee of a State, county, or city office that has prosecution, law enforcement, or child welfare responsibilities. Appropriate steps must be taken to disclose the relationship, ensure protection of privileged information, and reinforce confidence in the independent judgment and zealous representation of the public defender officer. A "close relationship" would include sharing a household and extended dating.
- g. An employee of the public defender office is a former employee of a State, county, or city office that has prosecution, law enforcement, or child welfare responsibilities. However, if the former employee of such office participated personally and substantially in a case, the public defender office would have a conflict of interest and be disqualified. If the former employee of such office did not participate personally and substantially in the case, a timely deployed "ethical wall" will prevent disqualification of the public defender office.
- h. An employee of the public defender office is a former employee of another public defender office or other law firm that represented clients in conflict with the public defender office where the employee is now employed. This situation sometimes occurs when Public Defender System employees transfer from one public Defender System office to another, and when personnel are hired from law firms that handle criminal or juvenile cases. Apply the same process as above.
- i. An employee of the prosecutor's office is a former employee of the public defender's office. Apply the same process as above.
- j. A public defender appears before a judge who is a former associate in the public defender office. In such cases, appearances before former associates are proper when there has been full disclosure.
- k. An employee of the public defender office is closely related by blood or marriage, or is engaged to be married, to a judge before which the public defender office appears, or otherwise has a close relationship with a judge before which the public defender office appears. A "close relationship" would include sharing a household or extended dating. Such a relationship must be disclosed in any case where the public defender office appears before the judge and each party given the opportunity to request recusal.

- l. A public defender has applied for or been offered a job in a state, county, or city office that has prosecution, law enforcement, or child welfare responsibilities, or is running for election as a prosecutor or law enforcement officer. In such cases, the Office of the State Public Defender may give the public defender and his or her supervisor guidance concerning campaign ethics laws, the public defender's caseload, and other matters to ensure client and public confidence in the continued zealous advocacy by the public defender and the public defender office.
- m. A public defender has applied for appointment to a judgeship.

L. Action after identifying a possible conflict of interest: There is no one-size-fits-all solution here, either. However, there are a couple "must do's" and several "maybe should do's" when a possible conflict is uncovered. They include:

- a. Seek advice from supervisors and others: A "must do." The first source of advice should be the office supervisor. An office staff meeting is a good vehicle for hashing out these issues. In addition, the Training-Conflict Coordinator of the Office of the State Public Defender is available to help answer questions of professional ethics.
- b. Full disclosure to the client: Another "must do," even if the attorney does not think there is an actual conflict. If the situation doesn't present a real conflict, the attorney should explain that to the client and obtain his or her acknowledgment that continued representation is appropriate. If the client doesn't agree and wants the attorney removed, or isn't mentally competent, the attorney can then make a decision on how to proceed. But, attorney must never withhold information from the client about any potential conflict. The attorney should document the disclosure and the client's response. The attorney should inform the client of his or her right to file a grievance of the issue and the right to raise the issue to the court.
- c. Request for waiver from the defendant or other current client: If there is an actual conflict of interest, the client may want to waive the conflict and retain the attorney after full disclosure of the conflict and what it means to continued representation by counsel. The attorney should document the disclosure and any waiver on the forms provided by the Office of the State Public Defender. The attorney should use sound judgment in deciding whether to ask a current client to waive a conflict. Some conflicts are so serious that the attorney should move to withdraw, even though the client likes the attorney so much that he or she would be willing to waive anything.
- d. Request for waiver from a prior client: If, for example, a prior client is a witness or an alleged victim in a current case, the attorney can ask him or her to waive a conflict. This would most likely involve consent for disclosure of privileged information or use of the conviction for which a public defender office represented the prior client as impeachment or character attack. Again, the attorney should use sound judgment in deciding whether to ask for such a waiver, as some conflicts are so serious that waiver will not remove the appearance of impropriety. See also Montana Rules of Professional Conduct, Rules 1.9 (Duties to Former Clients), 4.3 (Dealing with Unrepresented Person). Again, the attorney should document the disclosure and any waiver.

- e. Building an “ethical wall”: In rare cases, an “ethical wall” may cure a conflict of interest. This type of procedure will always be used when an attorney from another Region or the Major Crimes Unit comes into a new Region to handle a conflict matter. An “ethical wall” will screen the attorney from information except that necessary for his case. The “ethical wall” shall screen the attorney from both hard copies of other files, as well as any electronic information concerning the other clients, whether in the case management software, email, or other electronic data.
- f. Disclosure to the court and prosecutor: If the attorney is confident that the situation doesn’t present an actual conflict, the client agrees, and the attorney documented the client disclosure and acknowledgment, then the attorney may not need to disclose the situation to the court and prosecutor. The attorney may not want to inform others if doing so might tip trial strategy, compromise privileged information, reveal attorney work product, or cause undue invasion of someone’s privacy. However, if the attorney’s instincts indicate that it is too big of an issue to keep under wraps, or might come back to haunt him or her, then it’s time to bring in the judge and opposing counsel. Certainly, any actual conflict of interest should be brought to all parties’ attention, even if the client is willing to waive it.
- g. Making a record: If the matter is disclosed to the court and prosecutor, the attorney must make sure there is a record of it with all parties present. The client’s on-the-record waiver or agreement that there is no actual conflict of interest, after full disclosure that is also on the record, will close the door on almost any controversy. If the attorney’s position is that there is no conflict, the attorney will be required to elaborate; a simple denial of a conflict is insufficient.
- h. Moving to withdraw: If there is an actual conflict and there is no waiver, the office must withdraw. If multiple current clients are in conflict, the attorney may be able to keep one of the cases if he or she identified the conflict early enough. If so, the attorney should try to keep the most serious or difficult case. If that is not feasible, then the attorney should try to keep the first client in the door. Often, however, the conflicts among current clients aren’t discovered until the office is well into its representation of all. If so, the office usually must withdraw from all cases. If the attorney must move to withdraw, keep in mind that, as a general rule, the attorney doesn’t have to reveal the factual basis for the conflict. The attorney should resist requests to reveal anything more than is necessary to articulate the conflict and must protect privileged information.
- i. Resolve close cases in favor of the most conservative action: If an attorney’s instincts indicate something is a potential conflict, then it probably is. If an attorney is uncertain whether a situation presents an actual conflict, then it likely does. If an attorney is ambivalent about telling the court about a possible conflict that he or she thinks was resolved, then the attorney probably should.

M. Joint Defense Agreements: In the event of a multiple defendant case involving a public defender office, or a contract attorney, and any outside counsel, the following guidelines should apply to any joint defense agreements entered into. A joint defense agreement should be in writing, signed by all counsel and clients after consultation, and should provide the following:

- a. The agreement must not create any kind of an attorney-client relationship between co-defendants;
- b. Information that is shared under the agreement is privileged;
- c. Anyone who withdraws from the agreement remains bound by confidentiality as to any information obtained through the joint defense agreement;
- d. All parties agree that in the event one withdraws to cooperate with the government, any potential conflict of interest is waived by all parties. Anyone who withdraws from the agreement shall provide notice to all other parties prior to withdrawing, and return all documents provided pursuant to the agreement prior to withdrawing. A log should be kept of all meetings attended under the joint defense agreement, as well as any information and documents shared pursuant to the agreement;
- e. In the event that any defendant in the agreement testifies at trial, he or she agrees to waive the confidentiality provisions of the joint defense agreement to allow any other remaining party to the agreement to cross-examine him or her on the basis of information he or she has shared through the joint defense agreement;
- f. The agreement must recite a procedure for withdrawing from the agreement;
- g. All documents provided pursuant to the joint defense agreement must be returned upon the termination of the agreement.
